1. Presentation

Research is the main pillar supporting IBEI's development. The future challenges for IBEI, both as a graduate school and a research institute, require a commitment to strengthening research activities, in order to position IBEI as a relevant centre for global academic debate on international studies.

Promoting research at IBEI is particularly important for several reasons. Firstly, it helps connect local political and social interests and concerns with the strong currents of globalisation and internationalisation, which are occurring today. It is increasingly important to have relevant capabilities to develop in-depth knowledge of multiple aspects arising in global politics. Secondly, it gives the institution an excellent academic reputation, with recognised prestige in the international arena, as well as facilitating links to the world's most prominent research centres in this area of study. Finally, in order to guarantee a high standard of education for professionals and researchers in international studies, it is necessary to strengthen the connection between postgraduate education and high quality research.

Research activities at IBEI have gained momentum since 2008, when cooperation agreements were signed with three of the founding universities (UAB, UB, UPF), which resulted in several senior university scholars joining the Institute as researchers. In that year, two ICREA researchers also joined the Institute. IBEI was then in a position to obtain competitive research projects, increasing the institution's scientific output. Since then, IBEI has significantly increased the number of researchers hired directly by the Institute at the level of Junior Professor (assistant professors), in order to consolidate its graduate programme in International Relations. This team was supplemented through the successful IBEI strategy of attracting researchers with external funding (Marie Curie, Ramón y Cajal and Juan de la Cierva programmes).

Currently, IBEI brings together more than 25 PhD-level researchers, most of whom are in the early stages of their career, and are active in the sphere of international relations, comparative politics and international political economy. They develop a large number of research projects, have a strong publications background, and have excellent prospects for their future academic careers. Growth in the academic community took place in parallel to the increase in academic exchanges and intellectual debates at IBEI. These have been very significant over the years of initial development in research. As can be seen in this report, a large number of visiting scholars have come to IBEI, contributing to the vibrancy of academic life. The number of seminars, workshops and lectures held at the Institute during these years has also been substantial, illustrating the intense dynamism of IBEI's research activity in its early years.

2.2 Research Programmes

IBEI's research programmes aim to produce new scientific knowledge, preferably knowledge of a general kind. It also intends to disseminate this by means of the publication of its researchers' contributions in the international academic community's usual channels. Our goal is to define certain research programmes that are both attractive and flexible enough to allow the integration of different viewpoints, avoiding concentration on specific disciplines and/or very precise theoretical problems and study areas. The aim is to seek complementarities with the research carried out at the universities linked to IBEI, while also identifying areas in which there may be major potential for achieving high levels of quality and opportunity in the future.

The research programmes are structured around relevant matters with a transversal nature in the international sphere. It includes a theoretical focus and considers the dynamics of actors and institutions from a general viewpoint as well as the relationship between domestic problems and the global scenario. Therefore, the research programmes are not grouped according to regional areas, but are structured to include interdisciplinary themes and concerns; the aim of this is to facilitate dialogue and joint reflection among researchers.

With the intention of setting up strong research programmes, IBEI dedicates particular attention to all those matters related to existing challenges to the construction of a more balanced international system with a more multipolar structure. The lines of research for tackling these matters are broad-based and capable of covering different subject matters. In this regard, three specific research programmes to be run by the IBEI in the next few years are proposed.

Global Governance

Global governance is a matter of growing importance involving a series of major problems related to transformations in today's world's systems of government, regional integration, the relationships among different levels of government, and the definition of the new role of international organisations. Furthermore, the appearance of new actors in the international system, actors with very varied natures, has had an important impact on governance processes on a global scale, stimulating new public policies for the production of global and regional public goods.

Substantial growth in cooperation processes as the result, among other things, of the growth of international trade and also of the introduction of new and very different supranational integration patterns, has brought with it the creation of new joint work initiatives, the incipient production of public goods on a regional scale and the new definition of the role of the traditional multilateral bodies (in terms of finance, regulation, distribution, etc.) in order to enable greater integration and cooperation among countries.

Research fields

- Production of global public goods
- Regional political and economic integration processes in the world
- Global public policies
- International institutions and their government
- Actors and networks in worldwide society

Networks and Institutions in a Globalized Economy

Programme coordinator: Juan Díez Medrano

The aim of this research programme is to analyse the political and social context created by the acceleration of globalisation processes from the last decade of the 20th century onwards, and which is still occurring, including the intensification of trade integration processes at an international level and the dynamics of the new regionalism.

This programme's main themes are: the transformation and strengthening of state political institutions; the behaviour of the national political, social and economic actors in this new environment with highly globalised dynamics; and analysis of the interdependence that occurs among countries and which accelerates changes in institutions and public policies.

From the point of view of political economy, a central concern of this programme is the changes in the composition and comparative strengths of the different actors participating in the creation of public institutions and policies, whether national or transnational. The need to study and debate economic growth and democratic consolidation processes is proposed, especially for the developing world. An important consideration is the transformation of both the structures of interests and the actors' preferences as the result of the above-mentioned globalisation and integration processes.

Finally, this research programme studies the characteristics of the institutional innovations and new public policies, their impact on national societies and the mechanisms of their international spread. Special emphasis is placed on the new political, economic and financial institutions arising from globalisation processes and the political, economic and financial responses triggered.

Research fields

- The dynamics and politics of development
- The impacts of regional integration processes
- The transnationalisation of economic activities
- The spread of policies and institutions
- Democracy, States and growth

Security, Power and Multilateralism in a Global World

Programme coordinator: Esther Barbé

The last two decades have created a “new” security agenda, which incorporates problems of global scope (energy and environmental risks, transnational crime, global terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, massive population movements) that mutually reinforce both each other and traditional problems (armed conflicts, persistent poverty).

From the viewpoint of International Relations, the analysis of security is intrinsically linked to the distribution and exercise of power at an international level.

The system’s unipolarism, based on the United States’ military capacity, together with the “war on terror”, has attracted the attention of politicians and analysts in recent years. In this programme, the exercise of power as a social relation in today’s global world deserves a much more detailed analysis, one that incorporates institutional, structural and regulatory dimensions. This involves going into the analysis of the role played by different actors (emerging powers, the European Union, social movements) and by new principles (the responsibility to protect), which involve a challenge to the basis of the state system (national sovereignty). That is why human security now occupies a central role on political agendas.

“Passportless problems” in terms of security have given place to a broad consensus around the need for multilateral responses. For this programme, multilateralism, as an institutional form that coordinates interstate relations with regard to security based on common principles, presents a number of research questions related both to its effectiveness and its legitimacy in the 21st century.

Research fields:

- Multilateral security institutions
- Construction of the global security agenda
- Conflict management and prevention
- Fragile state, globalisation and armed conflict
- The European Union in the security sphere

EUCROSS-The Europeanisation of Everyday Life: Cross-Border Practices and Transnational Identities among EU and Third-Country Citizens

The EUCROSS project examines the relationship between the manifold activities of EU residents (nationals, mobile EU citizens, and third-country nationals) across the borders of nation states and their collective identities. Specifically, the project will:

- 1) map out individuals' cross-border practices as an effect of European integration and globalisation;
- 2) assess the impact of these practices on collective identifications (also controlling for the inverse causal process).

Which cross-border practices are more likely to foster some form of identification with the EU – e.g., contacts with foreign friends and/or unwanted foreigners, periods of labour mobility abroad, buying property abroad, business and tourist travel, or consumer relations with international companies? Under which contextual and individual conditions do these experiences promote a higher sensitivity to 'Europe' – rather than the 'local' or the 'global' – as an identity catalyst? Which social groups are more prone to adopt a European mindset in the wake of the Europeanisation of everyday life? To disentangle empirically the factors and mechanisms that link together the cross-border practices facilitated by European integration, globalisation and/or other dimensions of collective identity, we adopt a two-stage, mixed quantitative/qualitative approach. In the first stage, we will carry out a quantitative survey among nationals, intra-EU movers (Romanian citizens) and third-country nationals (Turkish citizens) who reside in six European countries (Denmark, Germany, Italy, Romania, Spain and the United Kingdom). In the second stage, we will interrogate, via in-depth interviews, the meaning given by individuals to cross-border practices, their collective identifications, and the role that the European Union, globalisation, and the nation play in these personal narratives, among a select typology of respondents to the quantitative survey.

CONSENSUS-Confronting Social and Environmental Sustainability with Economic Pressure: Balancing Trade-offs by Policy Dismantling?

CONSENSUS is a multilateral, multi-institutional and multidisciplinary project funded by the European Union as part of the European Commission's Seventh Framework Programme (2007-2013). It is being run by six universities in five countries, coordinated by the University of Konstanz (Germany). The Institut Barcelona d'Estudis Internacionals (IBEI, Spain) is one of the partners, together with the Free University of Berlin (Germany), the University of East Anglia (United Kingdom), Aarhus University (Denmark) and the European University Institute (Italy).

The project's goal is to advance in the systematic analysis of trade-offs and synergies among different levels of economic pressure and the process of changes in social and environmental policy – two key areas of sustainable development. In other words, the research tries to ascertain the extent of patterns of policy dismantling or expansion in the two areas studied, and how these patterns vary among countries and over time.

EUMARR-Toward a European Society: Single Market, Binational Marriages, and Social Group Formation in Europe

This collaborative international research project seeks to measure trends in binational marriages between citizens of the European Union and examine the extent to which these binational couples both express and contribute to the emergence of a new European middle class. The study departs from previous research on intermarriage through its exclusive focus on marriages between EU citizens and through the examination of binational couples not from the perspective of how foreigners integrate in host societies but, rather, from the standpoint of the formation of new social groups that one could describe as European. The project brings together demographic and sociological analysis thanks to the collaboration of an experienced and interdisciplinary multinational team of researchers from countries with a significant presence of EU citizens.

EU-PERFORM-Assessing the performance of the European Union in international institutions

The European Union has made multilateral governance a cornerstone of its foreign policy, and implicit in this is its engagement with international institutions. While much research has been carried out on specific institutions, little of it has been aggregated into comparative surveys between different institutions or over time. This collaborative project has two goals; the first is to establish a common research methodology for the study of EU performance, and the second is to conduct research in different international institutions and organisations in accordance with the methodology. The network consists of a core of three members with links to other universities and research centres that will also be involved with the project.

DYNAMUS-Dynamics of the Multilateral System. Analysis of the Interaction between the European Union and the Global Institutions

The strengthening of multilateral institutions is one of the strategic priorities of the European Union's foreign policy, as reflected in the European Security Strategy. Spain has also included the reinforcement of multilateral institutions in the guidelines for consensus in foreign and cooperation policy and the National Defence Directive. Nevertheless, the interaction between the EU and the multilateral institutions in the different areas of global governance has not really been subject to scientific analysis up to now.

The aim of the DYNAMUS project is to develop an analysis framework to describe and explain the EU's varying impact on the multilateral system, and vice versa. This analysis framework will be systematically applied to eight case studies relating to four key thematic areas: business and development policies, energy and environment, conflict management and disarmament, and human and social rights. The analysis framework will distinguish between three types of impact, depending on whether the changes occur in the area of (i) constitutive rules, (ii) regulative rules or (iii) standardization rules. In addition to identifying the type of impact produced in the different empirical cases, the project will analyse the mechanisms by which the impact was produced, for example coercion, socialization, persuasion, emulation and manipulation of the different tools available to the actors.

The systematic study of the mutual influence between multilateral institutions and the EU makes it possible to provide a baseline analysis of the EU as a rule maker and rule taker in the international arena. Furthermore, it makes it possible to establish comparisons between the EU and other international actors (the USA and emerging powers such as Russia, China and Brazil), which are also potential rule makers and rule takers. In practice, the research will help to scientifically identify the main obstacles for the policies for the promotion of multilateralism.

GLOBALREG-The Spread of Regulatory Institutions. Sectorial Networks and National Hierarchies in a Global World

In recent decades, a process of global spread of independent regulatory agencies has occurred. These have been adopted by a large number of states in order to implement regulatory policies in a large number of sectors. These agencies are particularly characterised by their organisational identity, separated from the classic administrative structures, as well as by their specialisation in monitoring, supervising and promoting regulation. If, before the 1980s, regulatory agencies around the world were limited to a few sectors –especially the financial sphere– and some countries, like the USA, the great spread that has occurred in recent years has taken this model to a large number of countries, and to sectors where the aim of regulation is controlling human, social and environmental risks, beyond simply supervising markets.

This project intends to analyse the reasons for this significant spread of regulatory agencies, and why it occurred in such a short time. The project proposes the creation of a database covering regulatory agencies for a wide range of sectors, including all countries in the world with more than a million inhabitants. Identifying the institutional and organisational characteristics of each regulatory agency, the main variations that exist within this kind of public institution will also be analysed. This will involve studying how the process of institutional transfer between countries and between sectors occurs in the context of the global spread of regulatory agencies.

POLICYSUBSTITUT-Understanding the Substitution Effect among Policies. A New Theoretical and Empirical Framework

From the theoretical point of view, it is worth asking why some governments prefer the particularist, sectorial (trade policy) political response, while others choose the universalist one (exchange rate policy, which affects the whole economy). The goal of this project is to construct the theoretical and methodological tools that allow an answer to be given to these questions and for the validity of this theory to be tested in four contexts in which there are strong substitution effects among policy instruments.

Firstly, the creation of an extensive new database designed specifically to measure governments' choices as regards policy instruments in the four areas mentioned, as well as the development of the statistical techniques (simultaneous equation models) needed to analyse choices of policy when there are substitution effects. Secondly, the development of a theoretical framework in order to understand how institutional characteristics at a national level affect the predispositions of governments to respond to similar political demands using sectorial or universal policies.

GLOVIR-The Governance of Virtual Globes with Global, Regional, State and Substate Case Studies

Virtual globes are software representations of the Earth to which layers of political, economic, social and cultural databases can be added. They are used more and more on public television and, particularly, the Internet, since the appearance of Earth.Google.com. This can occur globally, although there are restrictions and alternatives at macro-regional, national and sub-national levels.

The main goal of the new GLOVIR project is to identify and theorize about the main actors and factors explaining the behaviour behind the multi-level global governance of the publishing in globalising media of political, economic, social and cultural databases using virtual globes. The GLOVIR research group has theoretical, empirical and, finally, and to a lesser extent, prescriptive aims.

- What are the main actors governing virtual globes? Are they public governments, or private actors, or a complex mixture that requires new concepts? At what level are virtual globes most used? What is the interaction between actors and levels?
- What are the main political, economic and socio-cultural factors governing virtual globes? Are the political factors more important?
- What lessons can be learnt by the academic world, governments and companies?

INCAPSO-Effects of social capital on the innovation and internationalization of high-tech firms

The relationship between social capital and firm activities is becoming object of growing interest in the organizations and economic sociology disciplines. The research project we propose studies the effects of social capital on the innovation and internationalization of firm capabilities. Our study focuses on firms that belong to one of the most important high-tech clusters in Spain. The research objectives are: (1) Analysis of the effect that the professional and personal characteristics of researchers and managers in firms devoted to technological innovation have on the social capital they possess; (2) effects of researchers' social capital on three aspects of the innovation process (innovative creativity, problem solving that requires tacit knowledge, and assessment of business viability of possible innovations); (3) analysis of the effects that the geographic location of the people that generate researchers' social capital has both on their innovative creativity and problem solving during the innovation process; (4) analysis of the effects that the characteristics of firms and the industry have on the innovative capability of social capital; (5) analysis of the effect that the social capital that emerges from the relationships that firm managers hold with foreign professionals has on the event that their firm has or has not internationalized its innovation, commercialization, production and financial activities; and (6) analysis of the co-evolving nature of the relationship between social capital and the internationalization of firm activities.

INDIMOVE- Ethnic Politics and Development: A Comparative Analysis of Indigenous Movements in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile

Over recent decades Latin America has witnessed a dramatic sea change. Indigenous people became a formidable political force, something unthinkable even a generation ago. These movements demand equal rights to overcome longstanding inequalities, and push for special rights that recognize ethnic and cultural differences and secure political and territorial autonomy.

What is the significance of indigenous mobilization for democratic citizenship? What are the consequences of indigenous movements for inequality and poverty? Currently, we lack systematic answers to those questions. Remarkably little attention has been paid on how these new politics of identity are connected to developmental outcomes.

This project will fill in these knowledge gaps. It draws on comparative case studies of indigenous activism around land rights in Argentina, Chile, and Brazil. The research has three major objectives. First, it develops an innovative framework that integrates the analysis of causes and consequences of indigenous movements. Second, it investigates how and why the strategies and intensity of indigenous movements varies. Third, it explores how distinct forms of indigenous mobilization transform the implementation of citizenship and alter dominant conceptions of poverty and inequality. These objectives are pursued by using a qualitative methodology that combines protest event-analysis from local newspapers and semi-structured interviews with indigenous activists, non-activists, state officials, and economic elites.

GREI-International Studies Research Group

As an emerging research group, the GREI came together during 2008 under the auspices of the IBEI. The subjects for study by the group members combine the academic traditions and perspectives of international political economy with those of international relations. The main area for the research group to focus on is a wide set of global problems regarding politics and international development, with the study of international governance processes being tackled transversely. In this way, the group members consider, among other matters, the political economy of the States in the context of globalisation, the role of the multilateral institutions, and the networks of actors present in the international sphere or in the processes of interaction among countries and the effects on their public policies.

OBS- European Foreign Policy Observatory

The European Foreign Policy Observatory was founded as a research group in 2001 with the aim of promoting and increasing knowledge and debate about the European Union's foreign policy. The objective is to consolidate it as a group, raise the visibility of its scientific work (website), the education of young researchers, the group's internationalisation (work in European research networks) and the creation of a major joint body of scientific work.

Analysis of the Territorial and Partisan Dimension of the Regulatory Agencies Independence

The last decades have witnessed the acceleration of the diffusion process of autonomous regulatory agencies across policy areas and across countries, both at the national and sub national levels. Focused on the control, supervision and promotion of regulatory policies, these agencies are constituted as being independent from traditional administrative organizations. Spain was no exception to this global regulatory trend. Based on these developments, this project was intended to provide an innovative perspective to the study of regulation by developing a detailed picture and mapping of Spanish regulators from 1980 to 2010. The research focused hence on the development of a comprehensive database aimed at unravelling the characteristics of Spanish regulators, namely, board members of regulatory agencies across various policy sectors and level – both national and subnational. In all, the study provides a complex picture of 519 board members who have been subject to 669 appointments in 24 regulatory agencies. By means of this analytical reconstruction, the study was intended to provide a static and dynamic picture of Spanish regulators, while at the same time providing important insights into the process and the dynamics of regulation across the national and sub national levels. Results show that the “typical Spanish regulator” is a professional holding a degree either in Economics or Law. Contrary to theoretical expectations, regulators appear to have close connections with politics and political parties, which in part can be explained by the fact that designations rely mostly in the hands of the Executives being Parliamentary controls and requirements rather low.

Corporate Social Responsibility in South America from an integration and regulation perspective

This project aims to analyse the extent to which multilateral and regional agreements – symmetrical or South-South and asymmetrical or North-South – have boosted the creation of positive standards or regulations in the corporate sphere in Latin America.

Trade negotiations no longer only seek to integrate markets and expand trade, but more and more to promote trade in other areas – basically services – and the creation and harmonisation of regulations in new policy areas. Based on this notion, “Corporate Social Responsibility in South America. From the point of view of integration and regulation” offers an alternative and novel perspective as regards the study of corporate social responsibility (CSR). It looks at this matter from an area hardly explored until now: the interrelationship between trade agreements and domestic regulatory institutions, focusing on the structuring of rules regarding CSR.

Group Connect-EU Social Sciences and Humanities

The Group Connect-EU (consisting of 12 working groups) aims to promote and strengthen the participation of Catalonia in the Seventh Framework Programme of the European Union. The groups are made up of public and private stakeholders representing the territory who work in science and technology with high impact on the Seventh Framework Programme of the European Union. The working groups were convened by ACC10 (Catalan Agency for Enterprise Competitiveness). The result of the call for applications was the choice of these 12 groups representing technological sectors of the Catalan productive structure: sustainable automotive, advanced materials, energy and environment, food, medical technologies, smart transfits, factories of the future, reactions and catalytic processes, manufacturing systems and electronic components, nano-biotechnology, social sciences and humanities, and media and mobility. The social sciences and humanities group, which is enrolled the Institut Barcelona d'Estudis Internacionals, is coordinated by the Universitat Pompeu Fabra. Also involves the Universitat de Barcelona, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona, Centre d'Estudis Demogràfics, CIDOB, and the Fundació Centre d'Iniciatives i Recercas Europees a la Mediterrànea (CIREM).
