1. Presentation

This IBEI Scientific Report for 2012 and 2013 is the second in the series, after the initial report for the years 2008-11. Since IBEI was established as an inter-university institute in 2004, advanced research has been the main pillar to support its development. The dual nature of IBEI as a graduate school and a research institute has required a strong commitment to foster research activities, in order to position IBEI as a relevant academic center for international studies, at the crossroads of the Mediterranean, Europe and Latin America.

Research activities and projects at IBEI contribute to strengthening relevant capabilities for in-depth knowledge of multiple aspects arising in global politics. They also help consolidate IBEI's academic reputation in the international arena, as well as facilitating links to the world's most prominent researchers in this area of study. In spite of the serious economic difficulties that research activities have experienced in Spain over 2012 and 2013, due largely to significant public spending cuts in this area, which have also affected IBEI, the institute has been able to successfully overcome this challenge. Research activities at IBEI have been growing progressively, and having a greater impact during this difficult period. For example, the number of articles written by IBEI researchers published in ISI journals has grown constantly, as has the number of international academic workshops, which has more than doubled over the past two years compared to the previous period.

IBEI's strategy of attracting researchers with external funding has continued successfully (ICREA, EU-FP7, Ramón y Cajal and Juan de la Cierva programs), enabling the total number of researchers working at IBEI to be maintained during this period. As can be observed in this report, in 2012 and 2013, IBEI has been able to maintain and slightly increase competitive research funding, in part thanks to private sources of funding. These have included the establishment of a new Cátedra Telefónica (Telefónica Chair) at IBEI in 2013, and specific sponsorship for research activities by firms such as LA CAIXA, REPSOL or INDRA. However, this has been a difficult period for IBEI; a young research institute seeking institutional and academic consolidation, which has been significantly affected by the Spanish reduction in public funds for research during a key period of its expansion.

2.2 Research Programmes

IBEI's research programmes aim to produce new scientific knowledge, preferably knowledge of a general kind. It also intends to disseminate this by means of the publication of its researchers' contributions in the international academic community's usual channels. Our goal is to define certain research programmes that are both attractive and flexible enough to allow the integration of different viewpoints, avoiding concentration on specific disciplines and/or very precise theoretical problems and study areas. The aim is to seek complementarities with the research carried out at the universities linked to IBEI, while also identifying areas in which there may be major potential for achieving high levels of quality and opportunity in the future.

The research programmes are structured around relevant matters with a transversal nature in the international sphere. It includes a theoretical focus and considers the dynamics of actors and institutions from a general viewpoint as well as the relationship between domestic problems and the global scenario. Therefore, the research programmes are not grouped according to regional areas, but are structured to include interdisciplinary themes and concerns; the aim of this is to facilitate dialogue and joint reflection among researchers.

With the intention of setting up strong research programmes, IBEI dedicates particular attention to all those matters related to existing challenges to the construction of a more balanced international system with a more multipolar structure. The lines of research for tackling these matters are broad-based and capable of covering different subject matters. In this regard, three specific research programmes to be run by the IBEI in the next few years are proposed.

Global Governance

Programme coordinator: Nico Krisch

'Global governance' captures the changing patterns in which common problems are dealt with in today's increasingly interdependent world. Building on classical multilateral forms of cooperation, it encompasses today a bewildering array of actors and institutions. Public and private actors, formal and informal institutions, intergovernmental and transnational forms of regulation interact in an often uncoordinated, sometimes competitive, and typically highly complex structure. In this environment, many of the ways in which government and law have traditionally been enabled and hedged, both on the domestic and on the international plane, are growing less effective, but alternative controls are emerging only slowly.

The research programme on global governance seeks to understand the shape of global governance, its changing legal and normative framework as well as accountability mechanisms as they are adapting to the changing institutional landscape. It is particularly interested in the authority structures of global governance, in the norms that come to complement or replace traditional consent-based forms of legitimation, and in the ways in which different regimes and layers of law interact. The research programme is driven by a guiding interest in how, in the complex context of global governance, ideals of self-government are being, and can be, realized.

Research fields

- International institutions and their governance structures
- Actors and networks in global regulatory governance
- Forms of global authority
- The legitimacy of global law
- Constitutional interfaces between regimes in global governance
- Popular sovereignty in the global order

Networks and Institutions in a Globalized Economy

Programme coordinator: Juan Díez Medrano

The aim of this research programme is to analyse the political and social context created by the acceleration of globalisation processes from the last decade of the 20th century onwards, and which is still occurring, including the intensification of trade integration processes at an international level and the dynamics of the new regionalism.

This programme's main themes are: the transformation and strengthening of state political institutions; the behaviour of the national political, social and economic actors in this new environment with highly globalised dynamics; and analysis of the interdependence that occurs among countries and which accelerates changes in institutions and public policies.

From the point of view of political economy, a central concern of this programme is the changes in the composition and comparative strengths of the different actors participating in the creation of public institutions and policies, whether national or transnational. The need to study and debate economic growth and democratic consolidation processes is proposed, especially for the developing world. An important consideration is the transformation of both the structures of interests and the actors' preferences as the result of the above-mentioned globalisation and integration processes.

Finally, this research programme studies the characteristics of the institutional innovations and new public policies, their impact on national societies and the mechanisms of their international spread. Special emphasis is placed on the new political, economic and financial institutions arising from globalisation processes and the political, economic and financial responses triggered.

Research fields

- The dynamics and politics of development
- The impacts of regional integration processes
- The transnationalisation of economic activities
- The spread of policies and institutions
- Democracy, States and growth

Security, Power and Multilateralism in a Global World

Programme coordinator: Esther Barbé

The last two decades have created a “new” security agenda, which incorporates problems of global scope (energy and environmental risks, transnational crime, global terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, massive population movements) that mutually reinforce both each other and traditional problems (armed conflicts, persistent poverty).

From the viewpoint of International Relations, the analysis of security is intrinsically linked to the distribution and exercise of power at an international level. The system’s unipolarism, based on the United States’ military capacity, together with the “war on terror”, has attracted the attention of politicians and analysts in recent years. In this programme, the exercise of power as a social relation in today’s global world deserves a much more detailed analysis, one that incorporates institutional, structural and regulatory dimensions. This involves going into the analysis of the role played by different actors (emerging powers, the European Union, social movements) and by new principles (the responsibility to protect), which involve a challenge to the basis of the state system (national sovereignty). That is why human security now occupies a central role on political agendas.

“Passportless problems” in terms of security have given place to a broad consensus around the need for multilateral responses. For this programme, multilateralism, as an institutional form that coordinates interstate relations with regard to security based on common principles, presents a number of research questions related both to its effectiveness and its legitimacy in the 21st century.

Research fields:

- Multilateral security institutions
- Construction of the global security agenda
- Conflict management and prevention
- Fragile state, globalisation and armed conflict
- The European Union in the security sphere

3. Research Projects with External Funding Granted

EUCROSS-The Europeanisation of Everyday Life: Cross-Border Practices and Transnational Identities among EU and Third-Country Citizens

The EUCROSS project examines the relationship between the manifold activities of EU residents (nationals, mobile EU citizens, and third-country nationals) across the borders of nation states and their collective identities. Specifically, the project will:

- 1) map out individuals' cross-border practices as an effect of European integration and globalisation;
- 2) assess the impact of these practices on collective identifications (also controlling for the inverse causal process).

Which cross-border practices are more likely to foster some form of identification with the EU – e.g., contacts with foreign friends and/or unwanted foreigners, periods of labour mobility abroad, buying property abroad, business and tourist travel, or consumer relations with international companies? Under which contextual and individual conditions do these experiences promote a higher sensitivity to 'Europe' – rather than the 'local' or the 'global' – as an identity catalyst? Which social groups are more prone to adopt a European mindset in the wake of the Europeanisation of everyday life? To disentangle empirically the factors and mechanisms that link together the cross-border practices facilitated by European integration, globalisation and/or other dimensions of collective identity, we adopt a two-stage, mixed quantitative/qualitative approach. In the first stage, we will carry out a quantitative survey among nationals, intra-EU movers (Romanian citizens) and third-country nationals (Turkish citizens) who reside in six European countries (Denmark, Germany, Italy, Romania, Spain and the United Kingdom). In the second stage, we will interrogate, via in-depth interviews, the meaning given by individuals to cross-border practices, their collective identifications, and the role that the European Union, globalisation, and the nation play in these personal narratives, among a select typology of respondents to the quantitative survey.

bEUcitizen- All Rights Reserved? Barriers Towards European Citizenship

The European Court of Justice expects European citizenship to become the fundamental status of nationals of the Member States. It lies at the heart of the European integration process. The treaties, legislation, and case law have given Europeans an increasing number of rights. Yet the European Commission complains that these remain underused. Therefore, it has included in FP7 a call for a large-scale IP, identifying and analysing barriers to exercising such European citizenship rights.

Utrecht University is initiating a response to this call. In its project proposal it identifies research questions and several categories of potential hindrances as answers to some of them: contradictions between different rights, multilevel rights, and differences in priorities Member States accord these rights; differences in political, administrative, and legal institutions; financial restraints; lack of sufficient solidarity; administrative and bureaucratic hurdles; language problems; and other practical barriers to claiming and exercising rights - and related duties. Furthermore we distinguish citizenship rights by the types of rights - economic, social, political, and civil - and by the ascribed characteristics of the subjects of these rights: male and female, young and old, native and immigrant.

We believe multidisciplinary will help in identifying and analysing barriers to the exercise of European citizenship. We can learn from other times and places; therefore we add a historical and comparative dimension to the analysis. And we aim to combine insights from the historical, legal, and social sciences. Overall we want to investigate the options for a multi-layered citizenship true to the EU's motto 'In Varietate Concordia'.

CONSENSUS 2.0: Policy Dismantling in Europe during the Age of Crisis (2006-2013)

The main objective of the CONSENSUS 2.0 project is to advance the understanding of public policy change by exploring the causes for cross-national and inter-temporal variations in the extent and direction of policy change in public environmental and social policy from 01.01.2006 to 31.12.2013. The sample includes EU countries (Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom) and non- EU countries (Switzerland and Turkey).

To this end, the actual extent and direction of past environmental and social policy changes in the selected countries has to be identified in the first place. In particular, it will be assessed whether and to what extent an expansion or dismantling of public environmental and social policies occurred in the countries and subfields under consideration. In generic terms, policy expansion in the environmental policy field comprises policy changes by which public environmental protection is tightened or made more demanding, whereas policy dismantling comprises policy changes, by which public environmental protection is relaxed or made less ambitious. As regards the social policy field, policy expansion comprises policy changes by which statutory social benefits and services are raised or extended, whereas policy dismantling comprises policy changes, by which statutory social benefits and services are lowered or cut back.

The assessment of policy change will be made on the basis of a comprehensive collection of legislation. This collection encompasses all relevant national legal documents issued by Parliament in three specific areas of environmental and social policy respectively: Clean Air Policy, Water Protection, and Nature Conservation as regards environmental policy; Unemployment Benefits, Old-Age Pensions, and Child Benefits in the social policy field.

The CONSENSUS 2.0 project builds on the previous 7FP 'CONSENSUS', in which the same issue has been analyzed of policy expansion and dismantling in the social and environmental policy fields in the period of 1976 until 2005. The economic crisis of the last decennium has imminently put pressure on government expenditure. Therefore the main objective of the project is to examine to what extent the financial crisis has had any impact, and in which way, on national regulations.

EUMARR-Toward a European Society: Single Market, Binational Marriages, and Social Group Formation in Europe

This collaborative international research project seeks to measure trends in binational marriages between citizens of the European Union and examine the extent to which these binational couples both express and contribute to the emergence of a new European middle class. The study departs from previous research on intermarriage through its exclusive focus on marriages between EU citizens and through the examination of binational couples not from the perspective of how foreigners integrate in host societies but, rather, from the standpoint of the formation of new social groups that one could describe as European. The project brings together demographic and sociological analysis thanks to the collaboration of an experienced and interdisciplinary multinational team of researchers from countries with a significant presence of EU citizens.

EU-PERFORM-Assessing the performance of the European Union in international institutions

The European Union has made multilateral governance a cornerstone of its foreign policy, and implicit in this is its engagement with international institutions. While much research has been carried out on specific institutions, little of it has been aggregated into comparative surveys between different institutions or over time. This collaborative project has two goals; the first is to establish a common research methodology for the study of EU performance, and the second is to conduct research in different international institutions and organisations in accordance with the methodology. The network consists of a core of three members with links to other universities and research centres that will also be involved with the project.

WAYSOUT-Rules of Disengagement: Individual and Collective Ways Out of Terrorism in Spain

Little is known about why the users of terrorism abandon their violent strategy. Research has focused on the motivations for engaging in terrorism rather than on the motivations for renouncing terrorism. Yet a number of protracted campaigns have ended by the deliberate decision of participants. This research project aims at identifying the individual, material and societal incentives for giving up terrorism in the Spanish context.

For example, is the counter-terrorist effort the most significant variable behind a process of terrorist disengagement? Do groups that abandon violence come to the realisation that terrorism has failed or do they perceive new opportunities for achieving their political objectives through peaceful means? Do terrorist groups and individuals follow a simple logic of cost-benefit analysis? What leads individuals to accept offers of reduced prison sentences or amnesties? Is the decision to renounce terrorism the result of an individual or a group process? How do terrorists perceive the government's counter-recruitment strategy?

This research project will examine terrorist disengagement in three ethno-nationalist groups – Euskadi Ta Askatasuna - Militar (ETA-m) Euskadi Ta Askatasuna Político-Militar (ETA-pm) and Terra Lliure – in order to identify the mechanisms that facilitate abandonment, defection, decline or defeat. The present multi-level research project seeks to examine processes of disengagement from violent groups: (1) from the reasons why individuals decide to leave an organisation (micro level); (2) to the internal dynamics of such groups (meso level); and (3) effect of counter-terrorist policy on precipitating such disbandment (macro level). Overall, the project will provide an analysis of how Spain dealt with groups employing political violence and terrorism, and what lessons can be learned from these experiences that can be applied to future counterterrorism campaigns.

ACCOUNTREG-The Political Economy of Regulatory Agencies: Accountability, Transparency and Effectiveness

The rise and diffusion of regulatory agencies during the 1990s has enthroned a particular institutional model of state bureaucracy: the regulatory state. Based on autonomy, independence, and expertise as fundamental elements to the improvement of policy outcomes and economic efficiency, numerous regulatory agencies were established to regulate multiple sectors, including economic and social issues, in countries showing diverse administrative traditions. While democratic legitimacy has been traditionally entwined with accountability, the complex patterns of governance today make it increasingly difficult to determine who is responsible for and how to hold them accountable. Accountability has thus become a far-reaching concern for institutions, being this especially marked in the case of regulatory agencies. Moreover, the independence and autonomy of regulatory agencies raises the problem of accountability.

Moving beyond normative frameworks, this research project will empirically analyze the potential of regulatory agencies for political accountability. Taking accountability as a social relation between the agency and its forum, which includes an heterogeneous array of actors and organizations, the study aims to fulfill the following objectives:

- 1) To map and assess the transparency and access to information mechanisms of regulatory agencies in a comparative perspective, both in sectoral and national terms;
- 2) To assess the relations of cooperation and conflict between politicians, public servants, professionals, businessmen, and other stakeholders in the context of regulatory governance;
- 3) To better understand the policy communities around regulatory agencies, with a particular focus on their forum, their argumentation, and dialogue and justification dynamics;
- 4) To identify which accountability mechanisms are relevant for the effectiveness of regulatory agencies, as they foster a learning process within both the agency and the broader community.

EUIANUS-The EU in an Unsettled International System: Crisis, Polarity and Multilateralism

As a number of strategic documents illustrate, the promotion of the European vision of global governance, particularly in regard to multilateralism, has become a centrepiece of the European Union's (EU) external policy. Also in Spain the strengthening of global governance through multilateral institutions forms an important part of the foreign policy consensus. However, both the structures of the international system and the European integration project are currently experiencing rapid and unpredictable changes which have made evident the Union's difficulties to carry out its policies on the international stage. Due to its alleged characteristics of being "multipolar without multilateralism" this stage is considered to be problematic for the Europeans. The ongoing economic and financial crisis only has enhanced the problems the EU is facing.

The project EU-IANUS aims to develop a conceptual framework for the systematic analysis of the changes in the international system and the European integration process in four main areas in which the EU has become an international actor: Trade and Finance, Energy and Environment, Security and Defence Policy, and Human and Social Rights. Based on this framework, the project will explain the variations between the roles played by the EU in these four areas. More specifically, the analysis will distinguish between three possible types of European roles in global governance: (I) the EU as a "model" for global governance, (II) the EU as one of the "negotiators" of rules and norms of global governance, and (III) the EU as an "instrument" of international institutions that set the rules and norms of global governance. In addition to the identification of European roles, the project seeks to examine the methods, mechanisms and practices that enable the EU to exercise these roles under particular circumstances.

Finally, the rigorous, systematic and comprehensive study of the role of the EU in global governance will enable a cutting-edge analysis of its role as an effective and legitimate actor in different settings in the international arena. In particular, comparisons will be drawn with other key players such as the United States and various emerging powers (Brazil, Russia, India and China). In practical terms, the research will, grounded in scientific methods, contribute to the development of concrete proposals for the reinforcement of the principle of multilateralism in a changing and increasingly uncertain global governance system.

INTER-Interest Groups in Spain: Participation in the Governmental and Parliamentary Arena

The main purpose of this research project is to promote a comprehensive theoretical and empirical understanding of the role that interest groups play in the Spanish political system. Specifically we will examine interest groups mobilization across different policy venues and time, and the strategies they use to influence political decision making. For decades, political scientists have described the policy making as a process that takes place within closed policy communities characterized by the participation of few interest organizations that exchange information and resources vis-à-vis governmental actors, with high levels stability and control of the political agenda. Existing case studies in Spain and other advanced democracies illustrate how in most policy areas there are policy communities, which exhibit both stability and exclusiveness of access across time. Our goal is to test empirically whether this pattern of interest groups participation can be generalized across policy subsystems, and to what extent there are variations of across time.

To do that, we will develop a comprehensive database about the mobilization of interest groups in the governmental and parliamentary arena from 1986 to 2011 in Spain. More specifically, we will analyze all the appearances (comparecencias) of interest groups in the Spanish Parliament, and all the collegiate bodies (órganos colegiados) through which the Spanish government formally interacts with interest organizations for the discussion of policy issues. With this database we will map out which organized interests have access to the governmental and parliamentary arenas, and how participation varies across policy issues and across time.

This database is also a fundamental tool to analyze why participation of interest groups has changed over time. More specifically, we test whether changes in the participation of interest groups are related to regulatory reforms involving the entry of new ideas and ways of thinking about problems as the agenda setting approach would predict; and whether increasing delegation of political authority towards the EU and CCAA has altered the pattern of mobilization of interest groups in the parliamentary and governmental arena. Finally, we test to what extent formal access to the governmental and parliamentary arenas is important to explain the ability of interest groups to influence policy outcomes. To answer these questions we will also go into an in-depth analysis of ten issues, selected according to the methodology of the Intereuro research project. For each issue, we identify the policy positions of all the interest organizations involved in the policy making process. From here we assess which policy positions are taken into account in the final policy decisions.

With this research project we will cover the lack of systematic data about the role of interest groups in the Spanish political system, going beyond case studies; we will test empirically existing hypothesis developed by different approaches, and at the same time will try to make a theoretical contribution about the ability of interest groups to influence policy outcomes in a new context of multilevel governance. By using the same methodology as two other international research projects, we will be able to contribute to the internationalization of research communities, and compare the case of Spain with other EU countries and the US. Finally, we create a new tool about interest groups mobilization that will be available in the future for all scholars.

DYNAMUS-Dynamics of the Multilateral System. Analysis of the Interaction between the European Union and the Global Institutions

The strengthening of multilateral institutions is one of the strategic priorities of the European Union's foreign policy, as reflected in the European Security Strategy. Spain has also included the reinforcement of multilateral institutions in the guidelines for consensus in foreign and cooperation policy and the National Defence Directive. Nevertheless, the interaction between the EU and the multilateral institutions in the different areas of global governance has not really been subject to scientific analysis up to now.

The aim of the DYNAMUS project is to develop an analysis framework to describe and explain the EU's varying impact on the multilateral system, and vice versa. This analysis framework will be systematically applied to eight case studies relating to four key thematic areas: business and development policies, energy and environment, conflict management and disarmament, and human and social rights. The analysis framework will distinguish between three types of impact, depending on whether the changes occur in the area of (i) constitutive rules, (ii) regulative rules or (iii) standardization rules. In addition to identifying the type of impact produced in the different empirical cases, the project will analyse the mechanisms by which the impact was produced, for example coercion, socialization, persuasion, emulation and manipulation of the different tools available to the actors.

The systematic study of the mutual influence between multilateral institutions and the EU makes it possible to provide a baseline analysis of the EU as a rule maker and rule taker in the international arena. Furthermore, it makes it possible to establish comparisons between the EU and other international actors (the USA and emerging powers such as Russia, China and Brazil), which are also potential rule makers and rule takers. In practice, the research will help to scientifically identify the main obstacles for the policies for the promotion of multilateralism.

GLOBALREG-The Spread of Regulatory Institutions. Sectorial Networks and National Hierarchies in a Global World

In recent decades, a process of global spread of independent regulatory agencies has occurred. These have been adopted by a large number of states in order to implement regulatory policies in a large number of sectors. These agencies are particularly characterised by their organisational identity, separated from the classic administrative structures, as well as by their specialisation in monitoring, supervising and promoting regulation. If, before the 1980s, regulatory agencies around the world were limited to a few sectors –especially the financial sphere– and some countries, like the USA, the great spread that has occurred in recent years has taken this model to a large number of countries, and to sectors where the aim of regulation is controlling human, social and environmental risks, beyond simply supervising markets.

This project intends to analyse the reasons for this significant spread of regulatory agencies, and why it occurred in such a short time. The project proposes the creation of a database covering regulatory agencies for a wide range of sectors, including all countries in the world with more than a million inhabitants. Identifying the institutional and organisational characteristics of each regulatory agency, the main variations that exist within this kind of public institution will also be analysed. This will involve studying how the process of institutional transfer between countries and between sectors occurs in the context of the global spread of regulatory agencies.

GLOVIR-The Governance of Virtual Globes with Global, Regional, State and Substate Case Studies

Virtual globes are software representations of the Earth to which layers of political, economic, social and cultural databases can be added. They are used more and more on public television and, particularly, the Internet, since the appearance of Earth. Google.com. This can occur globally, although there are restrictions and alternatives at macro-regional, national and sub-national levels.

The main goal of the new GLOVIR project is to identify and theorize about the main actors and factors explaining the behaviour behind the multi-level global governance of the publishing in globalising media of political, economic, social and cultural databases using virtual globes. The GLOVIR research group has theoretical, empirical and, finally, and to a lesser extent, prescriptive aims.

- What are the main actors governing virtual globes? Are they public governments, or private actors, or a complex mixture that requires new concepts? At what level are virtual globes most used? What is the interaction between actors and levels?
- What are the main political, economic and socio-cultural factors governing virtual globes? Are the political factors more important?
- What lessons can be learnt by the academic world, governments and companies?

INCAPSO-Effects of social capital on the innovation and internationalization of high-tech firms

The relationship between social capital and firm activities is becoming object of growing interest in the organizations and economic sociology disciplines. The research project we propose studies the effects of social capital on the innovation and internationalization of firm capabilities. Our study focuses on firms that belong to one of the most important high-tech clusters in Spain. The research objectives are: (1) Analysis of the effect that the professional and personal characteristics of researchers and managers in firms devoted to technological innovation have on the social capital they possess; (2) effects of researchers' social capital on three aspects of the innovation process (innovative creativity, problem solving that requires tacit knowledge, and assessment of business viability of possible innovations); (3) analysis of the effects that the geographic location of the people that generate researchers' social capital has both on their innovative creativity and problem solving during the innovation process; (4) analysis of the effects that the characteristics of firms and the industry have on the innovative capability of social capital; (5) analysis of the effect that the social capital that emerges from the relationships that firm managers hold with foreign professionals has on the event that their firm has or has not internationalized its innovation, commercialization, production and financial activities; and (6) analysis of the co-evolving nature of the relationship between social capital and the internationalization of firm activities.

INDIMOVE- Ethnic Politics and Development: A Comparative Analysis of Indigenous Movements in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile

Over recent decades Latin America has witnessed a dramatic sea change. Indigenous people became a formidable political force, something unthinkable even a generation ago. These movements demand equal rights to overcome longstanding inequalities, and push for special rights that recognize ethnic and cultural differences and secure political and territorial autonomy.

What is the significance of indigenous mobilization for democratic citizenship? What are the consequences of indigenous movements for inequality and poverty? Currently, we lack systematic answers to those questions. Remarkably little attention has been paid on how these new politics of identity are connected to developmental outcomes.

This project will fill in these knowledge gaps. It draws on comparative case studies of indigenous activism around land rights in Argentina, Chile, and Brazil. The research has three major objectives. First, it develops an innovative framework that integrates the analysis of causes and consequences of indigenous movements. Second, it investigates how and why the strategies and intensity of indigenous movements varies. Third, it explores how distinct forms of indigenous mobilization transform the implementation of citizenship and alter dominant conceptions of poverty and inequality. These objectives are pursued by using a qualitative methodology that combines protest event-analysis from local newspapers and semi-structured interviews with indigenous activists, non-activists, state officials, and economic elites.

GREI-International Studies Research Group

As an emerging research group, the GREI came together during 2008 under the auspices of the IBEI. The subjects for study by the group members combine the academic traditions and perspectives of international political economy with those of international relations. The main area for the research group to focus on is a wide set of global problems regarding politics and international development, with the study of international governance processes being tackled transversely. In this way, the group members consider, among other matters, the political economy of the States in the context of globalisation, the role of the multilateral institutions, and the networks of actors present in the international sphere or in the processes of interaction among countries and the effects on their public policies.

OBS- European Foreign Policy Observatory

The European Foreign Policy Observatory was founded as a research group in 2001 with the aim of promoting and increasing knowledge and debate about the European Union's foreign policy. The objective is to consolidate it as a group, raise the visibility of its scientific work (website), the education of young researchers, the group's internationalisation (work in European research networks) and the creation of a major joint body of scientific work.

Group Connect-EU Social Sciences and Humanities

The Group Connect-EU (consisting of 12 working groups) aims to promote and strengthen the participation of Catalonia in the Seventh Framework Programme of the European Union. The groups are made up of public and private stakeholders representing the territory who work in science and technology with high impact on the Seventh Framework Programme of the European Union. The working groups was convened by ACC10 (Catalan Agency for Enterprise Competitiveness). The result of the call for applications was the choice of these 12 groups representing technological sectors of the catalan productive structure: sustainable automotive, advanced materials, energy and environment, food, medical technologies, smart transfics, factories of the future, reactions and catalytic processes, manufacturing systems and electronic components, nano-biotechnology, social sciences and humanities, and media and mobility. The social sciences and humanities group, which is enrolled the Institut Barcelona d'Estudis Internacionals, is coordinated by the Universitat Pompeu Fabra. Also involves the Universitat de Barcelona, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona, Centre d'Estudis Demogràfics, CIDOB, and the Fundación Centre d'Iniciatives i Recercas Europees a la Mediterrànea (CIREM).
